If I define -Xms = 4m and -Xmx = 12m, I believe that it will allocate the memory in chunks of 4m to minimize fragmentation. But then I came across this post which mentions that -Xms and -Xmx are different. Can someone clarify? A: The program is confused. In fact, the -Xms and -Xmx settings are not even related to each other. In Java, each JVM has its own heap. Its memory is divided into two sections: the old generation and the new generation. The old generation is only used for string constants, or strings that are on the stack when an object is created. The new generation is where the objects that are created on the stack are placed.
